Rondels of the Seasons, has shown us the Tuscan countryman at work in the different duties of his calling.1 A plain shirt of wool or linen, or of a mixture, tied at the waist, covered the body, leaving the head and legs bare. Stockings of wool were added in winter, and shoes of leather were put on for digging and felling timber. When going to town, or to Mass, they wore long buttoned-up gowns, or tunics, without sleeves, the shirt sleeves coming through, and a belt of leather was added, or not, as it pleased the wearer. Peasant women, in the fields, were clad in dingy clothing made of rough woollen cloth, or coarse linen canvas; but, when going into market or to Mass, they 1 At V. and A. Museum, South Kensington. T superimposed a skirt of black or green, and covered their heads with white linen kerchiefs, or woollen shawls. Operatives of the city were attired in the garments best suited to their various industries. These were never rags, but were made specially for their purpose, and sometimes donned over the home dress. Men and women alike were proud to be seen in the garb of the Guild to which they belonged. Wool, linen, canvas, and leather, were the materials used. The superior workmen were careful also to sport the crest or arms of their Guild upon their tunics: the wearing of such decorations however upon the head covering was forbidden, as offering...
