F. , 32, married, admitted for abdominal pain. Patient dates her illness from a miscarriage in February, 1907, when she was ill for ten weeks. Five days before admission she had a sudden attack of severe pain in the hypogastric region. She vomited four or five times, and felt so ill that she went to bed, where she remained until admission. Since the onset of pain micturition had been painful. Menstruation had been regular, but on the last occasion was very painful. She had a slight vaginal discharge. There was no history pointing to chronic intestinal obstruction. On admission she appeared ill; temperature, 1010; pulse, 130, full and regular; tongue moist, covered with white fur. Abdomen was distended, but moved well except in the hypogastric region, where there was tenderness, particularly at the sides. Per vaginam, in the region of the left tube, there was marked tenderness, and some thickening could be felt. It was thought that the case was one of a localized pelvic peritonitis arising from an inflamed tube. There was a good result from enemata, and patient appeared more comfortable. On the next day abdomen was much less distended; temperature, 98; pulse, 96. On the following day she suddenly showed signs of increasing peritonitis--temperature, 101; pulse, 130. A laparotomy by Mr. Carling showed general peritonitis and an annular stricture (malignant) of the sigmoid, which had apparently perforated, giving rise to a localized abscess, which had recently ruptured. The growth was resected,...
