With the selective history of North Omaha provided in Volume I of this series, Volume II begins with some closing chapters on North Omaha from Chapter I due to space considerations. These holdover chapters from Volume I include the Black church, the Black media in Omaha, African-American newspapers, the Black creative community (arts), North Omaha traditions (including festivals and African-American unity), Black politics and the history of civil rights in Omaha. From there the topic of North Omaha history morphs into my copious critique of Adam Fletcher Sassen s book on North Omaha, one that he had the unmitigated gall to self-publish and then pawn off as an authoritative piece. While admitting his approach, methodology and much of his interpretations were flawed, he nevertheless sought and continues to seek out a living on the speaking circuit though lacking in anything remotely resembling a history degree or background on urban planning or human geography. This section is exhaustive and is a searing critique of Sassen s voluminous work. I document how he was confronted and then ran for cover when the predicted critique was being written. His book contains some 124 chapters, all told, with many of them constituting no more than one or two pages. This fact in itself shows the short shrift that he paid to the history-rich area of an otherwise city of hillbillies, today ranking number 40 in total population. But the area being analyzed consists of an eight-square mile area on the northeastern sector of the city and it is one that has been mimicked, maligned, and exploited. Sassen covers churches (white), movie theaters, his version of African American politics, hospitals and streetcars. He superficially covers the...
