It is nevertheless difficult to obtain from the data in these two experiments any definite conclusions regarding the relative efficiency of the fats arid the carbohydrates as protectors of body material. In experiments Nos. 62 and 83, on the other hand, the external muscular work was purposely made the same in both, but unfortunately the amount of available energy was considerably less in the carbohydrate than in the fat diet, owing to a change in the diet that was necessary to make it palatable to the subject. With both diets, there was a draft upon the body material, but even with...
